OHG. is the only one of the older languages in which a fully developed adjectival use of the word exists along with the adverbial. In OE. there are very scanty traces of adjectival inflexion, néah being commonly employed either as a simple adv. or with a dependent dative: in predicative use it may sometimes be taken as an adjective, but it is more probable that in such cases also it is an adverb. It is not till the 14th or 15th cent. that the attributive use becomes common.

The original comparative of néah as an adv. is néar, néor, NEAR adv.[1], while the adj. form néarra finally became ner, NAR a. The OE. superlative néhst(a is latterly represented by NEXT a. and adv. After phonetic changes had obscured the relationship of these forms to the positive, a new compar. and superl., nigher and nighest, were formed, and have been in common use since the 16th cent.]

‖ Nisi prius (nəi·səi prəi·ŏs). Law. Also 8 nisi prise. [L. nisi prius, unless previously. The significance of the phrase is thus explained by Blackstone, Comm. (1768) III. 59:

'All causes commenced in the courts of Westminster-hall are by the course of the courts appointed to be there tried, on a day fixed in some Easter or Michaelmas term, by a jury returned from the county, wherein the cause of action arises; but with this proviso, nisi prius justitiarii ad assisas capiendas venerint; unless before the day prefixed the judges of assise come into the county in question.'

In the second statute of Westminster (1285) § 30, by which the system was instituted, only the word nisi is used. The following is an early example of the full phrase:—

Non, obs. form of NONE, NOON, NUN.

Non- (nɒn), prefix (also 4–6 noun-, noon-, 5 nom-, 5–6 nowne-, 5–7 none-, often written separate), used to express negation. The earlier formations were either directly adopted from, or modelled upon, Anglo-French compounds in noun- = OF. non-, nom-, nun-, num- (mod.F. non-) :—L. nōn 'not' used as a prefix; from about 1500 the predominant form of the prefix is that of the L. nōn. It appears first in English towards the end of the 14th c. in non-power (Chaucer, Langland, Wyclif), and non-residence, nonsuit (Wyclif). In the 15th and 16th c. a considerable number of compounds (chiefly nouns of action and gerunds) were in use, most of them being of a legal character. Until about the middle of the 17th c. the compounds formed with non- are mostly of a special or technical kind, but from that time the prefix became less restricted in its use and began to be prefixed freely to substantives, adjectives and adverbs, participles, and verbal sbs. (rarely to infinitival forms). To the political and religious movements of the 17th and 18th c. are due many new formations, some of which, as nonconformist, non-juror, non-resistance, have a permanent place in the language.

In the majority of the compounds of non- the hyphen is usually retained; but it is commonly omitted in the case of a few, such as nonconformist, nonentity, nonsense, in which the etymology has been to some extent lost sight of. Normally the prefix is unstressed, but in the disyllables nonage, nonclaim, nonsense, nonsuit, and in nonchalance, -ant, nondescript, the non- receives the stress. It is also liable to be stressed when the compound and the simple word are coupled togetber, as to act or non-act, distribution or non-distribution, being and non-being.

Formations having an independent status or a continuous history during any period are entered as Main words; a small proportion of the remainder are illustrated in this article, no attempt having been made to represent with any degree of fullness the very extensive development in the use of the prefix during the last hundred years.
